Two case studies in nineteenth century environmental history focus upon health as an issue central to understanding social organization. They explore the relationship between urban, industrial expansion, deteriorating environmental conditions and health. One study deals with assumption of responsibility for public health by the municipality of Pittsburgh. It focuses upon the relationship between public health and deteriorating urban environment in a burgeoning industrial city. The other is concerned with the response of coal miners to health and safety issues related to industrial expansion and technological developments in that industry. Excerpt from Why Individual Academics Want an Union, Two Case Studies Additional explanations may also be derived from the relationship of collective bargaining to organizational decision making. Bargaining determines the terms of individual employment by formal, indirect representation of individuals in organizational decision making, usually under regulation by the state or federal government. Thus, an individual's view of the current decision-making process in his or her academic setting might make bargaining seem more or less attractive. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books. This eBook presents two case studies of two organizations operating in Lebanon. The author has examined the organizational management practices of these two companies and then proposed solutions for each identified problem. The case studies represent an electromechanical company working in the construction field and a retail company that sells different product lines. This handbook is suitable for readers who are familiar with concepts in organizational management and development. Engineers working in the construction field may also find this book helpful in improving their managerial expertise and for understanding the way different departments within a company work together. "This research paper outlines the importance of due process and access to justice considerations in courthouse design. Extensive legal research into the nature of due process and access to justice is presented. The relationship between due process and access to justice and design are then investigated, with possible design problems or solutions identified. Two case studies of recently constructed Federal courthouses are then presented, and the design and architecture of the two buildings is analyzed in the context of the legal research that was presented. The findings highlight the importance of proper inclusion of the public as a stakeholder, and further research into jury and judge decision-making and bias in relationship to design is recommended.
